

Chinese Borders

Ida Höningmann
Technical Secondary College
Department of Computer Science
2700 Wiener Neustadt, Austria
Email: hoenigmann.ida@student.htlwrn.ac.at

Abstract—The abstract goes here.

I. INTRODUCTION

As China is not particularly friendly to most of its neighbouring countries and has the longest land border in the world, it is no wonder that there are several disputes and even more interesting facts about these lines on the map.

The topic of Chinese borders gives an insight into Chinese history, for which the Russian and Mongolian relations to China as well as Hong Kong and Macau are examples. It explores who and what gets transported out and into the country, such as workers building the Belt and Road Initiative, products being sold by China and North Koreans fleeing their country. Border disputes and the people living in these regions are yet another interesting case study along the Chinese border to Pakistan, India, Bhutan, Myanmar and, although already resolved, Nepal. While one would think being a communist lead country would help increase the relation to China, as it did with Laos, Vietnam shows that China is more picky and looks for more than just political beliefs. After having established all these interesting relations to all of its bordering countries China on land it tried extending its influence on the South China Sea.

II. NORTH KOREA

Along the border separating China from North Korea lies one of the holy sights of all Koreans: Mount Paektu. [1] Here South Koreans as well as North Koreans visit the Heaven Lake, although separated by multiple meters, as to not be able to see one another. From this mountain the two rivers Yalu and Tumen form. These rivers serve as the separation between the two countries.

Further west in Dandong a significant portion of North Korea's trade with the outside world is being moved by trucks over a single bridge. These trucks are being loaded up in China and send to North Korea, where they are unloaded and send back - mostly empty. The imports from China make up about 57%[5] of North Korea's imports in total.

One of the reasons China is exporting so many goods to North Korea is fear of the regime collapse, which would send thousands of North Korean emigrants over the border to China.

As there are already some defectors crossing the border further east, the shallow river is protected by Chinese guards.[3] All fleeing persons found, are sent back to North Korea, where they will most likely face death.

III. RUSSIA

IV. MONGOLIA

great wall of china?

V. KAZAKHSTAN

VI. KYRGYZSTAN

VII. TAJIKISTAN

VIII. AFGHANISTAN

IX. INDIA AND PAKISTAN

The border shared with India is crowded with border disputes. The rough terrain made it impossible to establish borders for the longest time in history. Now, with the technology to reach these isolated sections, many nations claim their chunk.

A. Jammu and Kashmir

When Britain left India they decided to split the country into a Moslem (now called Pakistan and Bangladesh) and a Hindu (still called India) part, according to the affiliation of people living in each region. In some regions the local ruler could choose to which side the region should belong. In Jammu and Kashmir the ruler opted for independence of both, but after being invaded by Pakistan turned to India.

The northern part of Jammu and Kashmir, Aksai Chin, is hard to access from India. So when China build a road through this terrain during the 1950s, India did not notice until 1957. Since Aksai Chin is administered by China.

B. Arunachal Pradesh

Arunachal Pradesh is a region located between China and India both regionally and culturally. While it is governed by India the native spoken language in this region is Tibetan. Therefore China claims the region it refers to as South Tibet.

X. NEPAL

XI. BANGLADESH

XII. BHUTAN

XIII. MYANMAR

XIV. LAOS

XV. VIETNAM

XVI. HONG KONG AND MACAU

The border between Hong Kong and China divides not countries, but values. Both Hong Kong and Macau were foreign colonies and are therefore what is called a special administrative region, which means they are allowed to have their own laws.

Fig. 1. Image caption.

One of the most obvious differences between mainland China and Macau is the absence of the law that forbids gambling. This has transformed Macau's skyline into a string of casinos. In 2018 the World Bank estimated Macau's GDP to be around 54 billion US dollars.

Hong Kong on the other hand is known for its freedom of speech, which has led many people reporting on the Chinese regime to move to this island. China, however, is starting to intervene in the highly valued right of freedom. The protest from the Hong Kong citizens against this behaviour was called the umbrella movement.

Both borders are separating China from what is technically also China. The procedure of crossing is very similar to an international border, as you need your passport and a visa for China[2] [4].

XVII. SOUTH CHINA SEA

XVIII. CONCLUSION

The conclusion goes here.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT

The authors would like to thank...

REFERENCES

- [1] The Indian Express. Explained: What is the significance of Mt Paektu for Kim Jong Un, 2019.
- [2] Macau Lifestyle. Macau-Zhuhai: The ultimate border crossing guide, 2019.
- [3] ABC News. An inconvenient border: Where China meets North Korea — abc news, 2017.
- [4] Vox. China is erasing its border with Hong Kong, 2018.
- [5] Wikipedia. Economy of North Korea, 2020.